

Visual routines for home

Support cards to preview the day and reduce conflict.

Respectful parenting and bonding

A secure bond is the foundation everything is built on.

A bond that gives security

When a child feels there is someone available and predictable, they dare to explore. Affection does not "spoil": it holds.

Responding to their crying, naming what they feel and returning to calm together are how they learn, little by little, to regulate from within.

Meeting the meltdown with calm

1. Your calm first: breathe; your steadiness is contagious.
2. Put it into words: "you're very angry because the game ended".
3. Offer closeness, not a lecture: sometimes being nearby is enough.
4. When the wave passes, repair and return to routine — no punishments or labels.

It is not against you

A meltdown is usually a small brain overwhelmed, not manipulation. Maturing self-regulation takes years.

Caring for the way we look at them

- Avoid comparing with siblings or other children: each has their own calendar.
- Celebrate effort, not just achievement: "you tried many times".
- Take care of yourself too: a rested caregiver accompanies better.